Spend your Rent check and say goodbye Dolly 'cuz Joan Bujacich's self released Dress Of Dawn is rarin' and ready for Broadway and beyond!

Although Dress Of Dawn has yet to become a musical it screams to be, anyone who can appreciate the art of contemporary musicals will embrace Joan Bujacich with open arms.
This artful collection laced in Broadway musicianship bounces from the dramatic, Amy Grant piano and rock guitar synth string pop of "Innocent To Me" and it's sweet childhood reflections, to the sad, piano- laden story of confusion and oddity of lost love and hearts apart in "Falling". Eerie and unpredictable are the haunting chord progressions of the spooky title track mysteriously winding it's way into staccato vocals in an eastern violin- flair while "Lovely Face" finds Joan pouncing 'round in a Kate Bush - like sound that is beyond beautiful.

Just when you thought you had pegged Joan's style, in dances the Lawrence Welk-like piano chord accompaniment of the slightly KD Langish "Don't Say A Word," where Broadway musical turns twang. Theatrics abound again in the curiously personal story of Joan's brush with Hurricane Floyd, simply titled "Floyd," and then Dress Of Dawn dances through a series of smooth jazz meets Euro-Spanish samba flair in the horn happy "Let It Dance." Joan then swoons her way into another KD Lang like self helper in "Torch Song," a tune that, like Michael Jackson's "Man In The Mirror," reminds you to turn toward not away from yourself, your dreams, to be on fire with life's love. Keeping with the inspirational theme, "If You Want Her" begs to follow your heart letting love not leave, in a grand return what is sure to become Joan's signature style, large and theatrical. Dress Of Dawn concludes with the bluesy jazz trumpet tap of "Another Smile, Another Day" and soars into the blues rock of "Step Out Of The Blue," which really is a grand conclusion to what feels like a 45 minute modern musical I'd love to see live, providing "Dress Of Dawn" is ever made into a theatrical work. Until then, enjoy the show!
